Origin of the Hue and Cry...

In the Middle Ages power lay in the hands of the feudal lords. They dealt with the affairs of their tenants. There was no effective mechanism for a higher national government until William the Conqueror.

The Norman Conquest of 1066 by William the Conqueror laid the foundation for a centralized government, the king's court or Curia Regis. This was a group of men who assisted the king and exercised the powers he gave them. This was the beginning of common law, the term used to describe the law common to all of England as opposed to feudal law which was the local law.

Thus under William a strong central government evolved. There was an immediate tightening up of the enforcement of public order. The duty of belonging to a group and of joining in the "Hue and Cry", translated from "Human Cry", in pursuit of offenders was impressed on each community.

Hue and Cry was the phrase used to signify the old common law process of pursuing a criminal with horn and voice. It was the duty of a person who was the victim of a crime or who discovered a felony to raise the Hue and Cry and his neighbors were bound to turn out with him and assist in the pursuit of the offender. All those joining in the pursuit were justified in arresting the person accused; even though it turned out he was innocent. If he resisted he could be killed; while if he submitted to capture, his fate would be decided. Proof was not required of his guilt but merely that he had been taken by Hue and Cry.

The various statutes relating to Hue and Cry were repealed in 1827.
